Spotlight on Speaker

Inge Kotzé (World Wide Fund for Nature)

Inge has been in her current role as Senior Manager of the WWF Sustainable Agriculture Programme for the past 7 years.

She has twenty years of experience in the fields of biodiversity research, conservation planning and environmental management.

Having completed a Master's Degree in Environmental Sciences & GIS (University of Stellenbosch), Inge spent 10 years working as a Researcher at the CSIR (Council for Scientific and Industrial Research) in the Biodiversity Research Group.

Inge then moved into the development of agricultural partnerships with the conservation sector. In this role, Inge has been spearheading the development of agricultural sector partnerships, integrating environmental sustainability, risk assessments and conservation stewardship into agribusiness, with a strong focus on making these systems and partnerships work for the farmer/growers, whilst bringing markets alongside to support these locally relevant, home-grown initiatives.

Inge coordinated the Biodiversity and Wine Initiative, a globally recognized collaborative partnership between the South African wine sector and the conservation sector, and subsequently moved on to support the initiation of similar initiatives across multiple commodities, including sugar, grains (barley) and fruit and livestock sectors in South Africa.

She has a passion for supporting and promoting the role of our farmers as the true custodians of South Africa's key natural resources, and the central role agriculture plays in our current and future economic growth and development.
